before they plunged themselves into inextricable debt. The point with them now was they should put aside all delay, and do this in the best way possible, and for providing the impetus necessary of giving time to the support of the late gentleman’s memory and promoting the opinions of an expert like Mr. Brougham. It was not good for them to be content with the idea of obtaining aid from the City of London, because there was no sufficient number of men to provide the necessary funds for these purposes.

The House was then adjourned.
